Host a New Virtual Misinformation Escape Room at Your Library

Is your public library looking for a fun way to teach community members about spotting misinformation in social media? Do you know people in your community who like to solve puzzles, play live-action adventure games, or who are craving some structured social activity? If so, your library can apply to be one of ten across the U.S. to host and evaluate an online escape room game, The Euphorigen Investigation. As part of a project led by the University of Washington Information School (UW iSchool), this game was developed in response to library staff who asked for ways to help patrons navigate misinformation beyond traditional information literacy programs.

Escape rooms are live-action adventure games where teams of players work cooperatively to solve a series of interactive puzzles. Euphorigen is a virtual escape room that is hosted on Zoom where players interact with the escape room website. Euphorigen was designed to be hosted by a library staff member for teams of teens (14+) and/or adults, with 4-6 players per team. During live gameplay, the library staff member hosts the teams in Zoom, points them to the website, and offers hints to players as needed. Players interact with each other as they try to solve the puzzles within a set amount of time.

The puzzles in Euphorigen focus on common forms of misinformation people find on social media, such as misleading charts, deep fakes, and social media bots. The session ends with the players participating in a 15-minute debrief discussion with the library staff member. Each escape room session lasts approximately 1.25 hours, including postgame discussion. Participation includes running six sessions of the escape room with players from their community, participating in a focus group, and supporting the research data collection processes.

For more information and access to the application, please check out their page at WebJunction: <https://www.webjunction.org/news/webjunction/host-escape-room.html>.
